Vermont Forestry Department Cooperates with Lumber Companies.

One of the difficulties experienced by the Vermont forestry department has been to keep efficient men for the summer fire patrol and lookout work, as well as for the more technical forestry work. During six or seven months of the year, while there is danger of forest fire, watchmen are maintained on Camel's Hump, Stratton mountain, and other high points, who are constantly on the lookout for fires. In other localities patrolmen are employed. During wet seasons these men are used in surveying and estimating the state forests and in other lines of technical work. The fire prevention work is made possible largely by cooperation with the federal convention. Vermont received last week $2,500 from the government for the protection of the navigable watersheds. While there are several lines of forestry work which these men could pursue in the winter, the lack of funds available for the forestry department makes it impossible to hold them. In this way good men no sooner become trained than they are obliged to seek permanent employment elsewhere. The present season, however, the forestry department has developed a scheme of cooperation whereby these men can be taken over and paid during the winter months by lumber companies. So far as the regular force of patrolmen goes the department stands ready to recommend them to lumber companies either for marking the trees which should be cut; for inspecting the cutting; or for scaling logs. Mr. Chamberlin, who is the watchman on Camel's Hump during the summer, has already secured work for the winter in this way on an operation near North Duxbury. Under the direc-tion of the forestry department he marks the trees which are to be cut; inspects the cutting to see that it is properly carried out; and scales the logs on the skidways. By securing permanent employment for men in this way, the forestry department will not only be able to build up a more efficient body of rangers for itself, but will be in a position to help lumber companies to secure better men than they are often able to se-
